INDENTURED SERVANTS

For Discussion:

Most of the people who came to Maryland in the 17th century came as indentured servants. An indenture was an agreement between a person who was willing to work for another for a certain amount of time in exchange for passage to America, a place to live, and food and clothing during the length of the indenture. In Maryland, a person served as an indentured servant on average about four to five years.

Most indentured servants were men who were often poor and saw little chance to make their lives better if they stayed in England. Their lives as servants were often hard, especially if their masters did not treat them fairly. At the end of his/her term, a servant was to receive a new suit of clothing, one axe, two hoes, three barrels of corn, and the rights to fifty acres of land.

The newly-freed servant was responsible for paying for the land to be surveyed and registered with the court.

INDENTURED SERVANTS

Historic St. Mary's City

Most indentured servants who came to Maryland had no special skills. As Cecil Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, planned for the colony, he hoped to attract servants with specific skills but he decided that any young man who was willing to work hard even if he had no special skill would be welcome. His recommendations included a carpenter as being “of all others the most necessary” and the following:

mill-wright
boate-wright
potter
ship-wright
whee-le-wright
mason
brick-maker
bricklayer
woodworker
joyner [joiner]
fisherman
turner
sawyer
gardener
smith
cutler
miller
leatherdresser

Activity:

Have students research and identify each of the skilled labor positions suggested by Lord Baltimore.

How many of these skills are still done today?

How many of these trades have been replaced by machines and/or other forms of technology?

Why do you think Lord Baltimore listed these particular skills? Why did he feel a carpenter was “most necessary”?

Extension:

Have students assume the roles of skilled laborers based on Lord Baltimore’s list.

Have other students assume the roles of gentlemen looking to secure the services of skilled indentured servants.

Negotiate the terms of the indenture based on how well the servant can argue his/her need in the new colony.
